Fortnite brought a ton of innovations to the battle royale genre, with one of the most notable being the popularization of the Battle Pass system. The Battle Pass serves as a way for players to earn rewards by playing the game, with each new season's pass bringing unique cosmetics and characters. However, Battle Passes weren't introduced until Fortnite's second season. Before Battle Passes and crossover characters, Fortnite's first season of content could be bought with in-game currency at the Season Shop.

The ever-popular battle royale title is in the final weeks of not only its Season 8, but its second chapter altogether. With Fortnite's "Cubed" season literally coming to an apex point in the form of The Convergence, Chapter 2 is set to go out with a bang. The Chapter 2 finale, "The End" recently revealed its start time and end date, which is supposed to extinguish all lifeforms. Whether or not that happens, at least one animal will be found in the aftermath.

Fortnite's biggest event and update to date probably came at the end of Fortnite Chapter 1, when the game began its second part. While seasonal updates come and go, Chapter 2 marked a massive change in how Fortnite played alongside its branding and even esports. Fortnite is currently wrapping up its 8th season of the second chapter.

The highlight of today's shop inventory is probably the Cyber Infiltration Pack. This bundle of three anime-style heroes only comes around every few months and brings with it a rare cel-shaded style that only a small handful of Fortnite skins have ever been given. The pack is only sold as a bundle, but unlike many such bundles, it can be purchased using your already existing V-Bucks balance, so you don't need to throw down any extra cash if you already have the 2,200 V-Bucks asking price. Here's everything in the Cyber Infiltration Pack:

The big changes to how Fortnite works are great fun for players and fans. However, seasonal changes could mean big things for esports too. Chapter 1 of Fortnite for esports was very much a testing ground. Even into its final seasons and the Fortnite World Cup, it seemed like Epic were still just throwing money at Fortnite and trying to figure out a format that worked. In Chapter 2, they found one.

"It is a little bit difficult at the beginning but people like the idea of it and just how cute it is, especially with the kiwis they get to see."

Idling is the act of having a bot "play" a Steam game for you when you're not actually present, in order to accumulate time spent with the title and unlock trading cards. These can of course be traded, but they can also be sold for real money on the Steam marketplace. Idling is mining strategy by which some less-than-honest folks gather cards to be sold, and it seems to have given Capcom Arcade Stadium a serious boost.

That's made clear by Valve's Steam Deck FAQ, published for partners looking to bring their games to the PC portable. Valve gives a definitive answer under the question, "Would Valve be interested in having any Steam Deck exclusive titles?" Its response: "No, that doesn't make much sense to us. It's a PC and it should just play games like a PC." There's no ambiguity there, and Valve is correct — portable or not, the Steam Deck is just a PC at the end of the day.

Epic aren't likely to be throwing the FNCS format away any time soon, or the Cash Cups. This system allows players, both pro and aspiring, to play a truly open esports event. There is a low barrier to entry and we get the widest field possible. This has meant for some tense and exciting finals, but also a system that encourages new players to come into the game. However, there are some big things missing which Chapter 3 could deliver on:

The map is probably the single biggest and most important change coming with the new season. That's unless you only play Fortnite to watch for the Default's fashion choices. Fortnite is rare amongst Battle Royales in how it treats its map. Unlike Warzone, Apex, and PUBG, there's no multiple maps going on here. Fortnite has one map at a time. No matter how much the community wanted to revisit Chapter 1, Epic have kept it locked in their vault. We can definitely expect a fresh one for Chapter 3. This new map will probably be a different shape, layout and with different POIs.
